Descripción

COURSE DESCRIPTION

This course aims to equip students with complex theoretical and empirical knowledge on the configuration of national, international and global media systems. The key objectives of the course are twofold. Firstly, it aims to explore and synthesize the key characteristics of world media systems in comparative perspective, their constitutive elements and the nexus between the configuration of media systems and political systems. Secondly, it provides students the opportunity develop and consolidate analytical skills necessary to compare media systems of different countries.

Based on extensive review of current interdisciplinary scholarship, this course introduces different approaches to conceptualize media systems, international communication, and practices of journalism across the globe. Emphasis is placed on topics including: press theories and normative models of media systems; media independence, policy and regulation; issues of media freedom and pluralism; media systems, news media and journalism; transnational and global media; global journalism and media systems.

Objetivos. Conocimientos y habilidades

OBJECTIVES

The key objective of this course is to provide a conceptual roadmap and an examination of media systems across different regions of the world in an interdisciplinary perspective, building on prior work in media and communications studies, political science, and media economy. Students will be familiarized with the role that media plays in democratic societies, the characteristics of media systems, and impact of the economic, social, political, regulatory and cultural aspects on various media environments.

KNOWLEDGE, COMPETENCIES AND LEARNING OUTCOMES

By the end of the course, students should be capable of:

- Understanding the underpinnings of world media systems;
- Identifying and describing the main elements that have conditioned the development of a globalized media environment and its main characteristics;
- Describing and analyzing the basic elements of media systems in specific areas of the contemporary information landscape;
- Recognizing the most important media groups of the world and the cultural and geopolitical elements that determine them;
- Developing a basic knowledge of mass media tendencies in the world today from a global, international and national perspective.
- Developing analytical skills, awareness of cultural, political and economic issues related to world media systems.
- Thinking critically, creatively and independently.
